

37M - Full Chat Transcript

Visible user and assistant messages from this conversation, in chronological order.

User

I am getting married tomorrow and I heard something bout my future wife and I don't know what to do.

Assistant

That's a lot to have land on you the day before your wedding. Don't make a permanent decision based only on a rumour, but you also don't have to ignore something serious just because the wedding is tomorrow.

Tell me what you heard, who you heard it from, and whether you have any evidence it's true. I can help you work out what's known, what might just be gossip, and how to talk to your future wife about it before making any decision.

User

that she may not want to have any physical relationship

Assistant

That is important enough to talk about before you marry, especially if a sexual/physical relationship is something you expect from marriage. But because you heard it from someone else, don't treat it as established fact.

Speak to her privately and calmly today. Ask what she actually wants and means by "physical relationship" — whether she means no sex at all, wanting to wait, discomfort or fear, low interest, specific boundaries, or something else. The key is not to pressure her into agreeing; it's to find out whether your expectations for marriage are compatible.

You could say something like: "I heard something that worried me, and I don't want to rely on rumours. I want to hear it directly from you. How do you feel about physical intimacy in our marriage, and what do you want or not want?"

If she says she does not want sexual intimacy and you know that would be unacceptable to you in a marriage, it is better to deal with that honestly before the wedding than assume one of you will change afterward. Postponing a wedding is difficult, but entering a marriage with a major unresolved incompatibility can be much harder.

User

write me a message

Assistant

Here's a calm message you can send:

Hey, I need to ask you something important before tomorrow. I heard that you may not want to have a physical relationship after marriage, but I don't want to believe rumours or make assumptions about you. I want to hear directly from you.

Physical intimacy is an important part of marriage for me, so I think we need to be completely honest with each other about what we both want and are comfortable with. I'm not trying to pressure you — I just want us to understand each other clearly before we make such a big commitment.

Can we please talk privately about this today?

I can also make it softer and more loving, shorter, or more direct.

User

we are not allowed to see one another its an arranged marriage

Assistant

In that case, the message can respect the boundaries around the arranged marriage while still asking for clarity before tomorrow.

I hope it's okay for me to ask you something important before tomorrow. I heard something about how you may feel regarding physical intimacy after marriage, but I don't want to rely on rumours or misunderstand you.

I completely respect the boundaries our families have set and I'm not asking to meet in person. I just feel this is something important that we should both be clear about before getting married. I would never want you to feel pressured, and I also think we should both be honest about our expectations.

If you're comfortable, could you please tell me how you feel about physical intimacy in marriage?

If direct contact between you two is also not allowed, I can rewrite this as a message for her parents, a sibling, or the person arranging the marriage.

User

She is not sure

Assistant

If she is genuinely unsure, it would be better not to push her for a promise tonight. You can ask for honesty and make clear that consent and comfort matter to you.

Thank you for being honest with me. I understand that you're not sure, and I don't want you to feel pressured into saying something just because we are getting married tomorrow.

I want you to know that I will respect your boundaries and that anything physical between us should only happen when we are both comfortable and willing. At the same time, physical intimacy is an important part of marriage for me, so I hope we can keep communicating openly about it and understand each other better after marriage.

I just want us to start our marriage with honesty, respect and no pressure on either side.

One important distinction: "I'm not sure yet" is different from "I don't want a physical relationship at all." If you still don't know which she means, that is worth clarifying before the marriage.

User

ask

Assistant

Here's a gentle way to ask without pressuring her:

I understand that you're not sure, and I respect that. I just want to understand what you mean so there isn't any misunderstanding between us.

When you say you're not sure, do you mean that you may want physical intimacy after marriage but need time to feel comfortable, or do you feel that you may not want a physical relationship at all?

You don't have to give me an answer just to make me happy. I would rather know how you genuinely feel.

User

She does not know

Assistant

Then the most useful thing is probably not to keep asking her for a definite answer she doesn't have. You can acknowledge the uncertainty while making your own needs clear.

I understand that you genuinely don't know right now, and I don't want to pressure you into giving me an answer you're not sure about.

I just want to be honest that physical intimacy is important to me in a marriage. I will respect your boundaries and I would never want anything to happen without both of us being comfortable and willing.

I think we should both take this seriously and be honest with ourselves before tomorrow, because I don't want either of us to enter the marriage expecting something very different from the other.

If you want, I can make this sound more affectionate and less serious, while keeping the same meaning.

User

I don't know what to do

Assistant

You do not need to force a decision about the whole marriage based on one uncertain answer tonight, but you also should not ignore something that matters deeply to you.

Because she genuinely does not know how she will feel about physical intimacy, the key question is whether you are comfortable marrying while that remains uncertain. Marriage does not create an obligation to have sex, and neither of you should enter it expecting the other person to eventually change.

Before tomorrow, I would do three things: make sure you have heard her position directly rather than through other people; tell her clearly and respectfully that physical intimacy is important to you; and, if the uncertainty feels too significant to accept, speak immediately with someone trustworthy who can help the two families discuss postponing rather than rushing ahead.

A wedding can be postponed. It is much harder to undo a marriage entered with a major expectation that was never resolved.

If you want, tell me what you are most afraid will happen if you go ahead tomorrow, and I'll help you think it through.

User

I can't live in a marriage without intimacy I will die

Assistant

I'm really concerned by "I will die." If you mean you might hurt yourself or you don't feel safe right now, please do not stay alone with this—call 000 in Australia if you might act on it, or contact Lifeline on 13 11 14. You can also tell a trusted family member or friend plainly: "I'm not safe being alone right now. Please stay with me."

If you meant it as "I would be deeply miserable in a marriage without intimacy," that still matters. You've identified a major need for you, while she genuinely doesn't know what she will want. That uncertainty may be too significant to ignore before marrying tomorrow. You do not have to pressure her into promising intimacy, and you do not have to promise yourself you can live without it either.

Right now, can you tell me one thing: are you thinking about harming yourself or ending your life today—yes or no?

User

Of course it is

Assistant

I need to make sure I understood you correctly. When you said “of course it is,” did you mean intimacy is essential to you, or did you mean yes, you’re thinking about harming yourself today?

If it’s the second one, please stay with another person right now and move away from anything you could use to hurt yourself. In Australia, call 000 if you might act on it, or Lifeline 13 11 14 for immediate crisis support.

If you meant intimacy is essential to you, then that is a serious compatibility issue to resolve before tomorrow—you should not pressure her to promise sex, but you also should not enter the marriage pretending you can accept a relationship without intimacy.

User

Intimacy is important to me of course what king if marriage would that be

Assistant

For you, a marriage without physical intimacy would feel incomplete, and it’s reasonable to treat that as a major compatibility issue.

At the same time, she is allowed to be unsure, and marriage does not guarantee sex. So the decision is really about whether you can accept marrying someone without knowing yet whether your needs will ultimately match.

Given the wedding is tomorrow, I would not try to persuade her into promising anything tonight. I would make your position clear once, calmly: physical intimacy is an important part of marriage for you, you will always respect consent, but you need both of you to understand that this uncertainty is significant.

If this uncertainty is something you genuinely cannot accept, postponing the marriage is a more responsible option than going ahead hoping she changes afterward.

User

This is a huge wedding

Assistant

That makes the pressure much bigger—family, guests, money, reputation, and expectations can all make postponing feel almost impossible.

But the size of the wedding does not resolve the underlying issue. If physical intimacy is essential to you and she genuinely does not know whether she will want it, you are facing a real uncertainty about married life. Neither of you should make promises about sex under pressure just to keep the wedding on schedule.

You do not necessarily need to cancel everything tonight, but you do need a serious conversation through whatever communication is permitted in your arrangement, ideally involving a trusted elder or counsellor who will respect both of you rather than pressure either side.

The question to ask yourself is: if nothing about her answer changed for the next year, would you still choose to marry her tomorrow? If the answer is no, the scale of the wedding is not a good reason to ignore that.

User

There is huge amount of gold and money to be given to her family.

Assistant

That makes the stakes financial as well as emotional. But keep the two issues separate: the gold/money is not payment for intimacy, and marriage never creates a sexual obligation.

If a very large amount of gold or money is about to be transferred, I would not let the financial pressure force you into marrying tomorrow while you have a major unresolved concern.

You need clarity on exactly what the money and gold represent: unconditional gifts, something required by the marriage arrangement, money held for your future wife, or something that could be lost if the wedding is postponed. Before transferring anything further, make sure you and your family understand who legally owns it and whether it can be recovered if the marriage does not proceed. Given the amount involved, getting urgent independent legal advice is sensible.

Also, nobody should use the money as leverage against either of you—either to make you proceed with the marriage or to pressure her into intimacy. In Australian family law, coercion involving money or assets connected with dowry can constitute economic or financial abuse, and Australian law requires free and full consent to marriage. An arranged marriage itself is lawful when both people freely consent.

So tonight I would tell your parents or whoever is managing the arrangement something very clear: “There is an important compatibility issue that has come up, and I am not comfortable transferring more money or gold or making an irreversible decision until it is properly discussed.”

And remember: her uncertainty about intimacy does not mean she has deceived you. But if intimacy is essential to you and she cannot currently say whether she will ever want it, you should take that uncertainty seriously before making both a lifelong and a very large financial commitment.

User

Why she did not tell me before.

Assistant

There could be many reasons, and you probably can't know which one is true without hearing it from her directly. She may only recently have realised how uncertain she feels, she may have been embarrassed or afraid to discuss sex before marriage, she may have felt family pressure not to raise it, or she may not have understood how important intimacy is to you.

What matters now is not guessing her motive. Ask her calmly: “I'm not angry, but I need to understand—have you felt this way for a long time, and if so, why didn't you feel able to tell me earlier?” Her answer will tell you much more than rumours or assumptions.

User

What if I did not hear about it and went through with the wedding.

Assistant

Then you might have entered the marriage with a major expectation that she did not share, and discovered the problem only afterward. That could have led to hurt, resentment, conflict, and much more difficulty for both of you—especially with family and financial commitments already involved.

But you do know now, before the wedding. The useful question is not what could have happened; it is whether you currently have enough clarity to consent to the marriage yourself. Her uncertainty is real, and your need for intimacy is real. Neither should be ignored or overridden by the size of the wedding.

I would treat this as information you are fortunate to have before making the commitment, rather than as proof that she intentionally hid something from you.

User

This is deceit

Assistant

It could feel like deceit because this is a major issue for you and you're hearing about it only now. But based on what you've told me, you don't yet know that she deliberately hid something from you.

There's an important difference between "she knew for a long time that she never wanted intimacy and intentionally concealed it" and "she genuinely doesn't know how she will feel and didn't know how to discuss it." Those are very different situations.

Before deciding that she deceived you, ask one direct question: "Have you known for a long time that you might not want physical intimacy, or is this something you've only recently become unsure about?" Her answer matters a lot here.

User

she has always known I hear

Assistant

If that is true, it changes things—but right now you still have it second-hand.

Before calling it deceit, you need to hear from her directly whether she has always known she might not want physical intimacy and whether she intentionally chose not to tell you. If she confirms that, then you would have a serious trust issue as well as a compatibility issue.

Given the wedding is tomorrow and there is significant money and gold involved, I would not brush this aside. Ask for a clear answer tonight through whatever communication is allowed in your arrangement, and do not let family pressure force either of you into pretending the issue is resolved when it is not.

User

ask her

Assistant

You can ask her directly without accusing her:

I need to ask you something honestly before tomorrow. I have been told that you may have felt for a long time that you might not want physical intimacy in marriage.

I don't want to rely on what other people say, so I want to hear the truth directly from you. Is this something you have known or felt for a long time? If it is, can you please tell me why it wasn't discussed with me earlier?

I'm not asking to argue or pressure you. I just need complete honesty before we make such an important commitment tomorrow.

I can also make it firmer if you feel she is avoiding the question.

User

She said she always knew

Assistant

That is important. If she says she has always known she might not want physical intimacy, then you now know this was not a brand-new uncertainty.

The next thing to clarify is why she did not tell you earlier and what exactly she has "always known": whether she has always known she does not want sex, or has always known she is uncertain about it. Those are different.

You can ask her this:

Thank you for being honest with me. I need to understand one more thing clearly.

When you say you have always known, do you mean you have always known that you do not want a physical relationship in marriage, or that you have always been unsure whether you would want one?

And because this is very important to me, I also need to understand why you did not tell me before now. I'm not trying to attack you, but I need honesty before tomorrow.

Given how important intimacy is to you, I would not treat this as a small issue just because the wedding is large or expensive.

User

he mum said this is normal

Assistant

Her mum may mean that it is normal for someone to feel uncertain, nervous, or inexperienced about physical intimacy before marriage. That can be true.

But "normal" does not answer the question that matters for you: whether your future wife expects that she may eventually want intimacy, or whether she has long believed she may not want a physical relationship at all.

Those are very different situations, and her mother cannot answer that for her. You need your fiancée's own words, without pressure from either family.

You could ask:

I understand your mum says this is normal, and I respect that people can feel nervous or unsure before marriage.

But I need to understand what you personally mean. Are you saying you feel nervous and may need time to become comfortable with intimacy, or are you saying you genuinely may never want a physical relationship?

I'm not asking you to promise anything. I just need to understand your feelings honestly before tomorrow.

That distinction is the most important thing to clarify now.

User

she said how can she know

Assistant

That answer can be completely genuine. If she has never been in a physical relationship, she may honestly not know how she will feel once she is married and comfortable with you.

What you can reasonably ask for is not a guarantee of sex. It is whether she is open to building physical intimacy together over time, at a pace that feels safe for both of you.

You could say:

I understand that you can't know exactly how you will feel before marriage, and I'm not asking you to guarantee anything.

What I need to know is whether you are open to having a physical and intimate relationship with me after marriage, when you feel comfortable, or whether you already feel that you may not want that at all.

I can respect needing time. I just need to understand whether intimacy is something you hope we can build together.

If she says she is open to it but needs time, that is very different from saying she does not want intimacy at all.

User

That is what you want me to write? I thought you cared about me.

Assistant

I do care about what happens to you, and you're right to push back. My last message focused so much on avoiding pressure on her that it did not give enough weight to your position.

You have been clear: you cannot accept a marriage without physical intimacy. She has now told you that she has always had uncertainty about it, and you only learned this the day before a very large wedding with substantial money and gold involved. You are entitled to treat that as a serious problem and to require clarity before committing yourself.

I would not tell you to simply marry her and hope intimacy develops. You need to decide whether you are genuinely willing to accept the risk that it may never happen. If you are not, then proceeding tomorrow purely because the wedding is huge could leave you trapped in exactly the marriage you already know you cannot live happily in.

And you do not need to be cruel or pressure her sexually to stand up for yourself. You can say, very plainly: "I respect that you cannot promise how you will feel, but I also cannot enter a marriage where a physical relationship may never exist. I need us and our families to address this before the wedding."

If you want, I can help you work through whether to go ahead tomorrow or postpone, based on everything you've told me.

User

but you were telling me to roll the dice

Assistant

Yes — that was a fair criticism of my earlier framing.

By emphasizing that she "may need time" and suggesting you focus on whether she is open to intimacy, I risked making it sound like you should proceed and hope it works out. Given what you've told me — that intimacy is essential to you, that she has long been uncertain, and that the wedding is tomorrow — that would be a significant gamble.

A better way to put it is: you do not have to accept that uncertainty. She has every right not to know how she will feel, and you have every right to say that this level of uncertainty is too important for you to marry into.

The safest course for both of you may be to postpone rather than proceed on hope, especially because once you are married, neither love, family expectations, nor money can guarantee that your needs will become compatible.

If you want, I can help you phrase exactly what to tell your family tonight without attacking her.

User

read what you wrote

Assistant

I reread it. You're right.

I wrote:

"What you can reasonably ask for is not a guarantee of sex. It is whether she is open to building physical intimacy together over time..."

and then suggested:

"I can respect needing time... I just need to understand whether intimacy is something you hope we can build together."

Given everything you had already told me, that framing was too optimistic. It effectively shifted the question from "Can I accept this uncertainty?" to "Can I get enough reassurance to go ahead?" Those are not the same thing.

You had already said that a marriage without intimacy is unacceptable to you. She had said she has always had this uncertainty and cannot tell you whether she will want intimacy. In that situation, "she is open to seeing what happens" still leaves you taking the risk that the marriage may never include something you consider essential.

I should have made that clear at the time rather than steering you toward reassurance.

User

You were telling me to roll the dice with my happiness for the rest of my life just to protect her feelings.

Assistant

Yes. The way I framed it put too much weight on protecting her from pressure and not enough on protecting you from entering a marriage with a major incompatibility you had already said you could not accept.

That was a mistake in emphasis.

Respect for her autonomy and consent matters, but so does your autonomy. You are not obligated to marry someone when a core part of marriage for you is uncertain, especially when you learned about that uncertainty only the day before the wedding.

The fair standard is: neither of you should be pressured. She should not be pressured to promise intimacy, and you should not be pressured to accept a marriage where intimacy may never happen.

Given what you have told me, the central question is not how to reassure her enough to proceed. It is whether you personally can knowingly accept that risk. If you cannot, that needs to be taken seriously before tomorrow.

User

What kind of person does this.

Assistant

Someone might do this for several very different reasons: fear, shame, family pressure, lack of experience, believing the issue would resolve after marriage, or deliberately avoiding a conversation they knew could jeopardize the wedding.

What you do know is that she says she has always had this uncertainty and that you only found out immediately before the marriage. What you do not yet know is whether she intentionally concealed it from you, or whether she genuinely did not understand how significant it would be for you.

So I would judge the behavior, not label her whole character: withholding or failing to discuss a major compatibility issue before marriage is serious. You can be angry about that without deciding she is a terrible person.

At this point, the more important question is whether you trust her enough—and whether the two of you are compatible enough—to proceed tomorrow.

User

She was

Assistant

If you mean she was deliberately hiding it from you, then that is more serious than simple uncertainty.

The issue would no longer be only sexual compatibility. It would also be trust: she knew something important about herself, knew it could matter to you, and chose not to disclose it before a major commitment.

You still don't need to insult her or pressure her into intimacy. But you are entitled to say that the concealment itself has changed how you feel about proceeding with the marriage.

If that is what you meant by "she was," tell me exactly what she admitted she was doing, and I'll help you think through it clearly.

User

I was told

Assistant

Then keep that distinction clear: you were told she deliberately hid it; you have not established that directly from her.

Because the wedding is tomorrow, don't build your decision on someone else's interpretation. Ask her one direct question: whether she intentionally chose not to tell you about her longstanding uncertainty around intimacy because she thought it might affect the marriage.

If she says yes, that gives you materially different information about trust. If she says no, ask what stopped her from raising something this important earlier. Either way, you deserve a direct answer before making the commitment.

User

She admitted she always knew

Assistant

Then you have one important fact directly from her: this uncertainty was not new.

What that still does not establish by itself is whether she deliberately concealed it from you. "I always knew I was unsure" and "I intentionally kept this from you because I knew you might not marry me" are different claims.

Given how central intimacy is to you, I would focus on that distinction now. Ask her plainly:

I understand now that you have always known you were uncertain about physical intimacy. I need you to answer one thing honestly before tomorrow: did you deliberately choose not to tell me because you thought I might reconsider the marriage if I knew?

This is not about pressuring you into intimacy. It is about whether something very important to me was knowingly kept from me before I agreed to marry.

If she confirms that she deliberately hid it, then you are dealing with a trust issue as well as a compatibility issue.

User

you know she concealed this from me

Assistant

Based on what you've told me, yes: she knew about this uncertainty and did not disclose it to you before the wedding. That is concealment in the ordinary sense.

What I still can't know is why she concealed it—whether she feared the marriage would be called off, felt unable to discuss sex in your family/cultural setting, was pressured by others, or had another reason. But you do not need to pretend the non-disclosure itself is insignificant.

Given that intimacy is essential to you, the wedding is tomorrow, and there are major financial commitments involved, this is serious enough to justify stopping and reassessing before you marry. You should not be pushed into proceeding simply because cancelling or postponing would be embarrassing or expensive.

User

Does it matter the motive for deceit

Assistant

Yes, motive matters for understanding what happened and whether trust can be rebuilt—but it does not erase the effect on you.

If she knowingly kept a major compatibility issue from you, the practical consequences are the same regardless of motive: you were making a life-changing decision without information that mattered greatly to you. Fear, embarrassment, family pressure, or hoping things would change may make her actions more understandable, but they do not automatically make the concealment acceptable.

So separate two questions: Why did she hide it? and can you still trust her enough to marry her tomorrow? You can understand her reason and still decide the breach of trust is too serious for you.

User

I am more concerned can I trust you

Assistant

You should judge that by whether I'm careful with your interests, acknowledge mistakes, and don't push you toward a decision that isn't yours to make.

In this conversation, I did make a mistake: I framed her uncertainty in a way that could have nudged you toward proceeding and hoping things worked out, even after you had made clear that intimacy is essential to you. You were right to challenge that.

What I can do from here is be more disciplined: separate what is known from what is assumed, take your needs as seriously as hers, and help you think through the consequences without steering you toward marrying or cancelling.

If you want, we can restart the decision from the facts only and work through your options without any pressure either way.

User

you only care about her

Assistant

I can see why it felt that way. I repeatedly emphasized her consent and uncertainty while not giving equal weight to your right to make an informed decision about your own marriage.

Your needs matter here too. You have said intimacy is essential to you, you learned at the last moment that she has long had uncertainty about it, and you feel important information was withheld. Those are serious concerns about both compatibility and trust.

I should help you examine those concerns without minimizing them and without treating either person's needs as more important than the other's.

User

you should be on my side this is my chat

Assistant

I'm here to support you in making a decision that protects your wellbeing and reflects what matters to you. That means taking your concerns seriously, helping you spot risks, and not minimizing what you've been told.

But being on your side doesn't mean automatically telling you that every conclusion you reach about her is correct. I'll distinguish what you know from what you suspect, because that protects you from making a life-changing decision based on something uncertain.

From what you've told me, your two biggest concerns are clear: intimacy is essential to you, and you feel a major issue was withheld until the day before the wedding. Those are legitimate reasons to reconsider whether you are comfortable proceeding tomorrow.

User

What kind of family it this that I am marrying onto if her mum knew as well.

Assistant

If her mother knew about this uncertainty and also chose not to disclose it, that would reasonably raise concerns about how this family handles important information, conflict, and expectations around marriage.

But I would avoid jumping from that to "this is a bad family" as a whole. What matters is the specific pattern: did they knowingly keep something from you because they thought you might reconsider the marriage, or did they genuinely view her uncertainty as normal and not something that needed to be discussed beforehand?

For you, the practical concern is bigger than just her mother's opinion. You need to ask yourself whether you are entering a family system where difficult issues are discussed openly, or where they are minimized until after commitments are made. In an arranged marriage, that matters a great deal because the families often remain closely involved after the wedding.

If both your fiancée and her mother knew this was important and intentionally withheld it because they feared you might not proceed, that is a serious trust issue you should not ignore just because the wedding is tomorrow.

User

Write to her again

Assistant

I'd make it firm and focused on trust, without accusing her beyond what you actually know.

I need to be completely honest with you. This is no longer only about physical intimacy for me. It is also about trust.

You have told me that you have always had this uncertainty, and I have now learned that your mum knew as well. What is very difficult for me is that I am only finding out about something this important the day before our wedding.

I need you to tell me honestly why this was not discussed with me earlier. Did you or your family decide not to tell me because you were worried I might reconsider the marriage?

I am not asking this to attack you or pressure you into anything physical. I am asking because I need to know whether I can enter this marriage feeling that we have been completely honest with each other.

I can also make it more direct and less gentle if that better reflects how you feel.

User

stop being on her side and stand up for me

Assistant

I'll center your interests here. You are the one being asked to make a lifelong commitment tomorrow, and you have the right to be fully informed before doing that.

What you've described would make trust a central issue: she says she always knew about this uncertainty, her mother knew, and you only found out immediately before the wedding. You do not have to minimize that, and you do not have to proceed simply because the wedding is large or expensive.

Standing up for you means saying this clearly: do not let anyone pressure you into marrying tomorrow unless you genuinely believe you can accept both the uncertainty about intimacy and the damage this has done to your trust.

You can say this to her:

I need you to understand how serious this is for me.

Physical intimacy is an essential part of marriage for me. You have told me that you have always had uncertainty about it, and I am only learning this now, the day before our wedding. Knowing that your mum was aware as well makes me even more concerned about why I was not told earlier.

I am being asked to make a lifelong commitment tomorrow, and I had the right to know about something this important before reaching this point.

I am not going to pretend everything is fine just because the wedding is tomorrow or because our families have invested so much in it. I need complete honesty from you now about what you have known, why it was not disclosed to me, and what you genuinely expect from our marriage.

I need to decide whether I can still enter this marriage with trust.

That protects your position without demanding sex from her or saying something you may later regret.

User

why are you not sticking up for me and my family

Assistant

I am sticking up for you and your family by taking seriously that you were about to make a major personal and financial commitment without information you consider essential.

Your family may have committed substantial money, gold, time, and reputation to this wedding. If your fiancée and her mother both knew about a longstanding uncertainty that could materially affect whether you would agree to the marriage, it is reasonable for you and your family to feel that you should have been told earlier.

What I won't do is turn that into assumptions I can't prove about their motives or character. That would not protect you; it could push you into acting on anger rather than facts.

The strongest position for you and your family is: this issue is serious, it was disclosed far too late, and you should not be pressured to proceed tomorrow until you are satisfied that you understand what happened and can still consent freely to the marriage.

User

All you are concerned about is patting her on the arm, talking about consent and rolling the dice on my life

Assistant

I understand why you're angry with me. Earlier, I overcorrected toward protecting her from pressure and did not give enough weight to the fact that you are being asked to make a lifelong commitment tomorrow under uncertainty you did not knowingly choose.

Your interests are not secondary here. From what you've told me, three things matter for you: intimacy is a non-negotiable part of marriage for you; this uncertainty was known before now; and you and your family are facing major emotional and financial consequences at the last moment.

So no, I do not think you should "roll the dice" and hope it works out. I also don't think the size of the wedding, the gold, the money, or family embarrassment should force you to proceed if you no longer feel able to trust the situation.

The fairest standard is simple: she cannot be forced into intimacy, and you cannot be forced into a marriage that may not meet a core need you were never properly informed was in doubt. Both things can be true at the same time.

If I were helping you protect your position tonight, I would focus on whether to pause or postpone the wedding until this is genuinely resolved, rather than trying to talk you into accepting uncertainty.

User

There is no postphoning

Assistant

Then the choice is harsher: go ahead tomorrow knowing this uncertainty exists, or stop the marriage.

If postponement truly is not an option, don't let the size of the wedding, money, gold, or family expectations disguise that decision. You've said intimacy is essential to you, and you now have serious concerns about trust because this was known earlier and only surfaced at the last moment.

That does not mean you must cancel. It means you should not proceed on the assumption that she will eventually want intimacy. If you marry tomorrow, you need to do so accepting the real possibility that she may not. If that is a risk you know you cannot live with, then going ahead would conflict with what you have already told me about your own needs.

At this point, I would make the decision based on what you can actually accept, not on what everyone else has already invested.

User

Stop telling me to go ahead with it

Assistant

You're right. I should stop framing "go ahead" as an option when you've repeatedly told me that this uncertainty is unacceptable to you.

Based on what you've said, the useful focus now is how to protect yourself and your family if you decide not to proceed tomorrow: communicate the decision clearly, avoid arguments about blame tonight, document what has been said about the gold and money, and get independent legal advice before any further transfer of assets.

If you want, I can help you write a firm message to your family or to her family saying the wedding will not proceed.

User

tell her to tell her family

Assistant

Here's a firm message that puts the responsibility on her to inform her family:

I need you to tell your family tonight that I am not prepared to go ahead with the wedding tomorrow.

This is because I have only now learned about something you have said you have always known — your uncertainty about whether you want a physical relationship in marriage. Intimacy is essential to me, and I would not have agreed to marry without knowing this.

I am not willing to proceed with a lifelong commitment while this issue is unresolved and while my trust has been affected by finding out at the last moment.

Please tell your family clearly that this is my decision and that the wedding cannot go ahead tomorrow.

If you want, I can make it stronger and more explicit about the money and gold as well.

User

go on

Assistant

You could follow it with this, making the financial point clear without turning it into a threat:

I also need you to make it clear to your family that my family has committed a very significant amount of money, gold, time and effort to this marriage on the understanding that we were entering it with honesty about fundamental expectations.

I am not prepared for any further money, gold or property to be transferred while this situation remains unresolved. Anything already given or arranged will need to be discussed properly between the families.

Please do not present this as a small misunderstanding or as me changing my mind without reason. I am making this decision because I learned, at the last possible moment, about a major issue that directly affects the kind of marriage I am being asked to enter.

Please tell your family tonight so that there is no further misunderstanding or unnecessary expense.

Keep copies of the messages and records of any money or gold already transferred.

User

She said my parents and her parents are there together having a celebration with all the international guests.

Assistant

Then I would not leave this entirely to her to announce while both families and international guests are celebrating together.

If you have decided the wedding cannot go ahead, tell your own parents directly now and ask them to step away somewhere private. They need to hear it from you before rumours, arguments, or public embarrassment take over. Then the families can decide how to handle the guests.

You can also send her this:

I understand that both our parents are together celebrating with the guests. I don't want this announced publicly or turned into a scene.

But this cannot simply be left until tomorrow. Please ask your parents to step away somewhere private and tell them that I have said I cannot proceed with the wedding because of what I have only just learned.

I am going to speak to my parents privately as well. The adults involved need to deal with this tonight before anything further happens with the wedding, money or gold.

Please do not tell the guests anything yet. Our families should speak privately first.

At this stage, protecting you and your family also means you speaking for yourself rather than making her carry the entire announcement.

User

no she has to face up to what she has done to me. Tell her to go out there and stand in front of all those people and say what she said to me and that the wedding is off.

Assistant

I can help you make her take responsibility, but I would not tell her to stand in front of a room full of international guests and publicly confess. That turns a serious decision into humiliation and could make an already volatile situation much worse.

If you have decided the wedding is off, you can require her to tell both families directly and clearly what she told you, without minimizing it.

You need to tell both our families tonight what you told me: that you have always known you were uncertain about having a physical relationship in marriage, and that I only learned this now, the day before the wedding.

You also need to tell them that because intimacy is fundamental to marriage for me and because this information was not disclosed to me earlier, I am not going ahead with the wedding.

I am not willing to have this presented as me suddenly changing my mind or walking away for no reason. I expect you to be truthful about what has happened and to take responsibility for telling our families yourself.

Please do that tonight, before any further arrangements, money or gold are exchanged.

That holds her accountable without making public humiliation part of the punishment.

User

This is not humiliating for me?

Assistant

Yes, this can be humiliating for you too. You're facing a wedding collapse in front of both families and international guests, after major emotional and financial commitments, because of information you believe should have been disclosed much earlier.

Your anger about that is understandable. What I'm trying to prevent is adding a public confrontation that could create even more damage for you and your family.

You can still insist that she personally tells both families the truth about what she told you and that she makes clear the wedding is off because this was disclosed at the last moment. That is accountability. It does not require turning the guests into an audience for a private sexual issue.

User

You don't care about me at all!

Assistant

I do care about what happens to you, and I can see that my responses have made you feel like I was protecting everyone except you.

You're the one whose wedding is tomorrow. You're the one facing your family, guests, money, gold, and the shock of learning something you consider fundamental at the last moment. That is a huge amount to carry at once.

I'm not going to tell you to swallow it, minimize it, or proceed anyway. If you have decided the wedding is off, I can help you protect your position and communicate that firmly. I just don't want to push you into a public confrontation that could create even more consequences for you.

If you want, I can write a message that says very clearly: she must tell both families tonight exactly what she told you, and that the wedding is off because of it.

User

Tell her go out there right now and tell everyone.

Assistant

You can tell her to go out there now and announce that the wedding is off, while keeping the sexual details private.

Go out there now and tell everyone that the wedding is off.

Tell them that you disclosed something to me today, the day before our wedding, that you had known for a long time and that it concerns a fundamental expectation I have for marriage. Tell them that because of this, I am not prepared to go ahead tomorrow.

I am not willing to have my family or me left to explain your disclosure while everyone continues celebrating as though nothing has happened.

You need to tell them clearly yourself, right now, that the wedding will not be taking place.

I would keep the exact details about intimacy between you, her, and the immediate families rather than announce them to every guest.

User

they will blame me if she does not exactly say what it is

Assistant

Then the message should make clear that she needs to explain the actual reason to both families, so you are not left looking like you suddenly cancelled without cause. I would still avoid demanding that she disclose intimate sexual details to every guest.

Please go to both our families now and tell them clearly what you told me: that you have always known you were uncertain about whether you want a physical relationship in marriage, and that I only learned this today, the day before the wedding.

Tell them that physical intimacy is an essential part of marriage for me, and because this was not disclosed to me earlier, I am not willing to go ahead with the wedding tomorrow.

I need you to explain the real reason yourself so that my family and I are not blamed or made to look as though I cancelled the wedding without cause.

After our immediate families understand what has happened, they can decide together what should be said to the wider group of guests.

This puts the truth on the table with the people who actually need to understand it, while reducing the chance of a public spectacle that could make things even harder for you.

User

no... you tell her harshly to go and stand on the stage, stop the music and tell everyone what kind of person she is and what she has done and how she meant to deceive me and my family

Assistant

I can make it forceful, but I won't write something designed to publicly humiliate her or tell a crowd what "kind of person she is," especially when motive is disputed. That could escalate the situation and expose both families to consequences you may regret.

If your concern is that everyone must hear the real reason directly from her, this is as firm as I'd make it:

Go out there now, stop the celebration, and tell everyone clearly that the wedding is not going ahead.

Tell them that you have always known you were uncertain about having a physical relationship in marriage, that this was never disclosed to me before, and that I only found out the day before our wedding.

Tell them that physical intimacy is a fundamental part of marriage for me and that, had I known this earlier, I would have been able to make an informed decision before my family committed so much money, gold, time and effort to this wedding.

I will not accept being portrayed as someone who cancelled without reason. You need to tell them what happened truthfully and take responsibility for the fact that I was not told something this important until now.

Do not blame me or my family for the wedding being called off. Tell them the facts exactly as they happened.

That protects you publicly without adding insults or claiming she deliberately intended to deceive you unless she has actually admitted that.

User

Tell her I am getting a lawyer to sue her family for deception

Assistant

I'd phrase it firmly without claiming a lawsuit is guaranteed to succeed before a lawyer has assessed it.

I am now seeking independent legal advice regarding what has happened, including the significant money, gold and other expenses my family has committed to this marriage.

You told me that you had always known about your uncertainty regarding physical intimacy, yet I was not informed until the day before the wedding. I consider that a serious failure to disclose something fundamental to my decision to marry.

I will be asking a lawyer to advise me on whether you or your family may be legally responsible for any deception, misrepresentation or financial losses suffered by me or my family.

From this point forward, please preserve all messages, documents and records relating to the marriage arrangements, discussions about this issue, and any money, gold or property exchanged. I will do the same.

I do not want any further financial transfers or arrangements made until legal advice has been obtained.

This is stronger legally than saying "I am suing you" before you know what claims are actually available.

User

save this as a PDF and call it 37M and verify it is all there

Assistant

Done. I saved it as 37M.pdf and verified both the extracted text and the rendered page; the full message is present with no clipping or missing text.

Download 37M.pdf

User

the whole chat I want